Sam Bevenour zealously defends individual and corporate entities alike from criminal charges, regulatory fines and enforcement actions. He excels at issue-spotting in cases dealing with complex and voluminous discovery, and has extensive trial experience in cases with complex national security issues, along with white-collar and high-profile federal matters.

Dedication to detail and effective advocacy

During law school, Sam traveled the country to defend clients as a part of Northwestern's Wrongful Convictions Clinic, and after graduation continued this work as a PILI fellow. He also published an article on the Classified Information Procedures Act in Northwestern's Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, where he served as an editor. Sam is passionate about constitutional rights, and pursued law school after spending many years as a paralegal under the tutelage of multiple Chicago attorneys.
