

SPAC Statement from More than 60 Firms Draws Widespread Media Attention

September 3, 2021

International, business and legal press were abuzz with news that Katten, along with more than 60 leading law firms, joined to express concern about recent derivative lawsuits that assert SPACs should be regulated as "investment companies."

Media coverage focused on the collective response from large law firms and the implications for special purpose acquisition companies. At issue is whether SPACs should be treated as investment companies under the Investment Company Act of 1940.

Katten attorneys are among those who say no.

"A SPAC's primary goal is not to invest in securities, but to buy an operating company," Capital Markets Partner Timothy J. Kirby told The American Lawyer. "As SPACs went more mainstream, there has been more of an emphasis on transparency. You can go back and forth whether as a vehicle it is preferable to a traditional IPO, but the plaintiffs are trying to push them [SPACs] into being covered through the Investment Company Act. That doesn't apply."

Richard Marshall, Financial Markets and Funds partner told The American Lawyer that the derivative litigation isn't good for anyone. He questioned the motivation for filing.

"I think particularly this is a way to get the SEC to weigh in, which I think would be unwise. And that would be a whole different ball game," Richard said.
